Anch Chapel

Surrounded by nature, the Anch Chapel is not an object to be viewed from afar but rather an attempt to blend in naturally with the surrounding environment. Its distinctive expression and character are derived directly from the trees' own elements, which makes the chapel stand distinct from its surroundings and blend in with nature's scenery at once and the same time, making the chapel accessible to the eye of the observer very similar to a tree's opening and closing when one moves through it, looking upwards through the branches' chaotic network of nesting lines. The chapel not only has functionality of great importance, but also working with environmentally low impact materials and minimizing environmental damage are both very important to the chapel's success. Its boundary lines with the surrounding landscape, allowing for a seamless flow between building and nature.
